YUKON INDIAN OPENS CONEY ISLAND EYES

Walter Harper, Who Climbed Mount McKinley, Rings the Bell Twice.

STRENGTH TESTER POPS

Dunks the Navy with Ease and Shuts Glass Balls to the Delight of Astounding Beach.

Walter Harper, half-breed Alaskan, was the sensation of the world on Wednesday when he climbed the 20,320 foot peak of Mount McKinley, in the Territory of Alaska, from the south end over the 20,320 foot peak of Mount McKinley, in the Territory of Alaska, from the south end. The fact of Harper's climb, however, was not all that was of interest in the mountain. Harper was accompanied by a party of Indians, who had been invited to join him in the climb. The Indians were of the Koyukon tribe, and are said to be the only Indians in the world who can climb the mountain.

The Koyukon Indians are well known for their勇力 and endurance, and Harper was confident that he could make the ascent without difficulty. Harper started the climb at four o'clock in the morning, and arrived at the summit at four o'clock in the afternoon. The climb was made in a time of six hours, and the Indians were equally successful. Harper was much pleased with the result, and declared that the Koyukon Indians were the only Indians in the world who could climb the mountain.

The Indians were much pleased with the result, and declared that the Koyukon Indians were the only Indians in the world who could climb the mountain. Harper was much pleased with the result, and declared that the Koyukon Indians were the only Indians in the world who could climb the mountain.

The Indians were much pleased with the result, and declared that the Koyukon Indians were the only Indians in the world who could climb the mountain.